The aim of this study was to establish whether a relationship existed between the variables job satisfaction and organisational culture of employees within a service organisation. The concept of organisational commitment has been examined extensively in organisational literature; yet the relationships between organisational culture, subculture, and commitment have received little attention so far. Acknowledging the complexity and the multifaceted nature of antecedents involved in organisational commitment, it is still necessary to understand the dynamics of relationships. Comparing the differences between job satisfaction and organisational commitment determine which is more strongly related to performance for your selected company. According to Nelson and Quick, job satisfaction is a pleasurable or positive emotional state resulting from the appraisal of ones job or job experiences. To determine the relationship between employee satisfaction and organisational commitment, the current global economic situation continues to challenge work establishments to be extremely prudent in the areas of budgeting, employee selection, staff complements, and training. Variables with job satisfaction as the dependent variable are training and organisational citizenship behaviour. The mediating role of job satisfaction is crucial in understanding the relationship between organisational commitment and job satisfaction. Although research on the causal relationship between job satisfaction and organisational commitment has been done, the results of their research are often contradictory.

The relationship between job satisfaction and organisational commitment among academic staff members at a selected higher education institution in South Africa research objectives to investigate the relationship between job satisfaction and affective commitment. To investigate the relationship between job satisfaction and normative commitment, employees job satisfaction and commitment depend upon the leadership style of managers. This study clarifies further the relationship between leadership behaviors of managers and two employees' work-related attitudes: job satisfaction and organisational commitment.
